AUTHOR BIOGRAPHIES

Roland B. Wilson is the Program Coordinator and faculty advisor for the Conflict Analysis and Resolution (CAR) Program at George Mason University's campus in South Korea. He is also the Founder and Director of the Peace and Conflict Studies Center Asia (PACSC Asia), serving as an international mediator, conflict resolution practitioner, and consultant. He holds a doctorate in CAR from George Mason University. Bringing a unique depth of experience spanning nearly 40 years, Dr. Wilson's career is shaped by combined military, government, and academic service. His expertise encompasses Asia-Pacific relations, foreign policy, security studies, and complex conflict and social issues. Having lived in Asia for over two decades, Dr. Wilson is sought for high-level training, strategic analysis, and consulting on international and intergovernmental conflicts, peace processes, and human security efforts. His current focus is on capacities for the peaceful resolution of culturally diverse and protracted social conflicts.

Yoochan Kong is an undergraduate student at George Mason University Korea, where he majors in Conflict Analysis and Resolution. His interests include foreign policy, governance, public affairs, and alternative dispute resolution. He aspires to a diplomatic career focused on Korean Peninsula issues.

Hyunwoo Jo is an undergraduate student in Global Affairs at George Mason University Korea, with concentrations in Global Governance and Media, Communication, and Culture, and minors in Computational and Data Sciences and Data Analysis. His research interests include public policy analysis and development—particularly in international governance and technology, and in higher education administration.

Shin Mo Shin Mo is a senior at George Mason University Korea majoring in Conflict Analysis and Resolution. Her interests include negotiation, mediation, and understanding how social tensions can escalate into interpersonal conflict. She is also interested in strategies that help organizations manage disputes and strengthen collaboration. She hopes to apply these skills in ways that support others and contribute to constructive conflict resolution.

Suyoung “Sarina” Oh is an undergraduate student majoring in Conflict Analysis and Resolution at George Mason University Korea, where she serves as the student representative for the program. Her academic interests include peacebuilding, victim–perpetrator reconciliation, and restorative justice in post-conflict societies. She is particularly interested in the ethical and structural conditions that enable genuine reconciliation beyond formal settlements. She hopes to contribute to international peace efforts through work with organizations such as the United Nations, with a focus on reconciliation and post-conflict recovery.

Hayoung Hwang is an undergraduate student at George Mason University Korea majoring in Global Affairs and minoring in Conflict Analysis and Resolution. Her interests include human security, social, cultural, and identity-based conflicts, and community engagement. She hopes to develop sustainable frameworks for addressing identity-based conflicts and strengthening security in vulnerable communities.

Yoonbeen Cho is an undergraduate student majoring in Conflict Analysis and Resolution at George Mason University Korea. Her research interests include environmental displacement, human security, climate governance, and sustainable peacebuilding in East Asia. She currently serves as a senior intern at PACSC Asia and as a Peace Game intern, contributing to research on conflict analysis and regional security. She hopes to develop practical policy frameworks that address the intersection of climate vulnerability and regional stability in the Asia-Pacific.
